Two Green Eyes

It was my first day in London. I stepped out of a plane feeling delightful whiffies of fresh wind. I had been sent here by my university to gain my first experience in journalism. It was 9.40 am when I landed and at 11.10 am I should have had an interview with the director of a sustainable London TV-channel. I must have hurried.

On the information board I saw a city map. I needed Mayflower Street, 137. But (no way!) it appeared to be in the other end of the city. Should I have decided to go by social transport it'd have taken two hours to get there. But no sooner had I turned round than a balding man in a velvet jacket and needle shoes with beaming green eyes came to me.

- You need Mayflower Street, 137! geez! - He shouted I had no idea about where he knew that but I was so exhausted I couldn't think about anything but how to get to my destination.

- Yes, I do. How much?

- Nothing, - he whispered. I, taken aback, wanted to go away from this stranger but felt magnetized with his vivid green eyes.

- Okay, - I answered.

- So, you're a young journalist hurrying for an interview that can decide your future career path, - he started a conversation driving us farther from the airport.

- Yes, I am. But how on earth do you know all that? - I wanted to ask him to let me out off the car since I began to feel more and more intimidated, but couldn't say a word.

- You are to tell me an breathtaking story of your life! I had a hard time struggling with his magnetizing eyes and started to narrate a bright story about visiting the Stonehenge.

- Follow! Such a great story! And, oh, I've forgotten to name myself. I'm Mr Kolly, your new director. You've passed an interview and you're accepted!
